

Libraries are Critical to Recovery for Florida

By Laura I. Spears, PhD

Florida House Speaker Chris Sprowls (R, Pinellas) recently addressed the 2021 Florida legislature, citing the Latin phrase “semper paratus” or “always ready” as a principle that should guide Florida’s response to emergency management. This is the guiding principle for Florida’s libraries and underscores the value that libraries deliver daily. Amid COVID-19 concerns, Florida libraries have continued to meet the needs of their communities in a variety of ways and are critical elements of communities as they recover the impact of this pandemic.

Specifically, libraries have continued to be reliable providers of internet access. According to the PEW Research organization, over half of Americans (87%) surveyed said that internet access has been essential or important as communities faced lock downs, parents worked from home and children began virtual homeschool. But as businesses closed and people were laid off, the ability to pay for internet access or other needed technologies worried almost 30% of American, and disproportionately impacted people of color and lower income communities.

Many libraries innovated by negotiating with library vendors to increase access to electronic resources including e-books, audio recordings and streaming videos as digital lending in libraries by vendors like Overdrive resulted in a 33% increase over 2019. As Publishers Weekly reported, 2020 was a record year for Overdrive, with readers worldwide borrowing “430 million e-books, audiobooks and digital magazines.”

Literacy experts became even more important and librarians took their book discussion groups and children’s programs online; regularly scheduled programs were recorded and as copyright allowed, recordings have been made available on demand. Home schooling motivated demand for live, online tutoring programs throughout the state.

Academic libraries increased their hours for the online Ask-A-Librarian program and digitized course materials to meet students’ needs as Fall 2020 courses were primarily held online. At the University of Florida, aggressive efforts to meet needs included expanded access to licensed materials and innovative digital lending to support an abrupt move to wholly online learning.

In July, Florida libraries submitted requests for over $5 million to the federal CARES Act funding, competing for the $1.9 million allocated by the Institute of Museum and Library Services. Most applications sought funding to extend their virtual services with more hotspots, and expanded WiFi services that increase wireless connectivity to patrons using it in the library parking lots. Some sought personal protective equipment to keep their staffs safe while they get their libraries open so that library patrons could access internet and computer services to find work and apply for unemployment insurance. Libraries continue to provide support for job seekers and small businesses. Many libraries collaborate with Career Source Florida, a key community resource for job recovery.

With these programs and services, libraries support literacy, technology needs, and employment efforts, serving as incubators for new ideas and opportunities in Florida’s communities. And with adequate funding in the 2021 state budget, libraries can continue to be crucial elements of our state’s recovery from COVID-19.
